MAGARY PREACHES AT HIS OLD CHARGE

Detroit Minister Comes Back To First Church To Talk At Dedication Of The New Organ.

TO FIRST CHURCH TO TALK AT DEDICATION OF THE NEW ORGAN

Life may be like a great organ, its scattered elements assembled, transmuted and dedicated through beauty to the worship of God, said Dr. Alvin E. Magary of Detroit, former pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Cedar Rapids, in a sermon on "Prophetic Music" at the dedicatory service of the new organ of the local church, Sunday at 11 a. m.

The First church witnessed one of the greatest throngs in its history as hundreds of its members and friends gathered to greet the former pastor and hear the great $30,000 instrument which was recently installed. Many extra chairs increased the usual seating capacity.

Marshall Bidwell played the organ "Prelude to Paradise" (Wagner) for the opening number, "In Paradise" (Dubois), and "Toccata on the Organ" (Wagner) for the offertory. Joseph Kitchin played the offertory, "Adagio from the Violin Concerto in G Minor" (Brahms) with organ accompaniment.

Dr. Magary chose for the basis of his sermon the story as told in Chronicles II of the building of the temple by the Israelites and how it was reared by King David, a sacrifice of his poverty, as a structure of praise to God. And there were "those who were set aside to prophesy upon the harps."

"The universe," he said, "pulsates with the rhythm of God. It is a universe of music. The story of the morning sing together and tell the story of creation" were the words of the Psalmist.

The ocean's ever-recurring waves and tides, the human heartbeat, the measured tread of the seasons are playing the rhythmic music of God's symphony.

Music is the oldest and the newest of the arts. The savage in the jungle expressed his primitive instinct for reaching out to find God in the rhythmic beat of the totem-totem. Since earliest times man sought through music, as through all beauty, to find Him. Ancient men were said to play on "an instrument of ten strings."

Yet today, in an era of mechanical genius, in a world of practical affairs, men still worship God by building a great organ which they dedicate to His service. They live in an age of machinery, yet they glorify the tendency of the age.

The organ, said the speaker, is a symbol of the art of life. Out of the earth the organ builder has assembled his materials, the self-made elements from which he has built bridges and steam rollers. These he has transmuted to compose a thing of beauty.

So each life may, gather up and transmit out of its confusion, its scattered ambitions, its tempers, weariness, discontent, its generosity, charity, industry, aspiration for God, an instrument for His worship. Out of its "raw material" it may build for the great symphony of being, as exemplified in the life of Jesus.

Then, as the organ is dedicated, so life may be dedicated with its strength, its power, its ambitions, as an offering to God.

Before the sermon Dr. Magary read a telegram from Mrs. Magary. "Extend love and greetings to the dear members of the old First church and tell them how I long to be with them at the dedication service."

Dr. Magary departed Sunday afternoon for his home in Detroit, where he is pastor of the Woodward Avenue Presbyterian church.
